They are not so much observed today, but there exists quite another fact connected with the another fact connected with the Moon upon which these eclipses cast much light, namely, the question of the exgether with the brightest of the stars istence of a lunar atmosphere. If the Meon were surrounded by an atmo-sphere such as the Earth's we would itself between our eyes and the star, would gradually blot the star out from sight as the latter got behind a more dense section of the air. This, however, is not the case. The star remains absolutely clear till it is sud-denly blotted out by the Moon body
